FATHER LIAM SAYS: Shortly before the death of Jesus we are told in John's Gospel that some Greeks told the Apostle Philip: 'Sir, we wish to see Jesus'. Is it possible for us 2,000 years later to see what Jesus looked like? If the Turin Shroud is genuine, then indeed we can see the likeness of Jesus. It was only with the advent of photography that the Shroud revealed the likeness it had secretly carried for so long. The first ever colour photographs of it were taken in 1969. In 1978 equipment that had just been developed for the NASA Space Project produced the most astonishing results. Commenting on the idea that some medieval artist might have produced such an image, Peter Schumacher, who had invented and developed the latest technology for NASA said: 'One must consider how and why an artist would embed three dimensional information when no means of viewing this property of the image would be available for at least 650 years after it was done ... would an artist produce this work before the device to show the results was invented'. John's Gospel also tells how Peter and 'the disciple Jesus loved' went to the tomb on Easter morning. The other disciple reached the tomb first. 'He bent down to look in and saw the linen wrappings lying there but did not go in. then Simon Peter came following him and went into the tomb. He saw the linen wrappings lying there and the cloth that had been on Jesus head not lying with the linen wrappings but rolled up in a place by itself'. Many people believe that the linen wrappings are what we call the Shroud. The Gospel does not speak of a Shroud. To trace the whereabouts of that cloth for 2,000 years is impossible.

There is a strong ancient belief that it was taken for safety in time of persecution, from Jerusalem to Edessa – present day Urfa in Eastern Turkey. Is there any evidence that this linen cloth was even in Jerusalem or Turkey? In 1976 pollen of the plants peculiar to Jerusalem and Turkey were discovered in the Shroud. Examinations carried out in Philadelphia revealed that in addition to the pollen grains found in great measure there was a surprising amount of remains of plant parts and other floral debris. This strongly suggests that actual whole flowers must, at some time, have been laid on the cloth's surface. A specialist identified plants that grow in Israel, Jordan and the Sinai. In particular there was a plant, Gundelia, which blooms between March and May and only in Israel. This, of course, is the very period of the year when Christ was crucified.

The Dukes of Savoy owned the cloth for about 500 years from 1453 and Ex-King Umberto III of Italy, who was of the House of Savoy, gave it to the Vatican in 1983. It has been in Turin Cathedral from 1578 until the present.

Jesus, we are told in the Gospel, was buried 'following the Jewish custom'. We don't know exactly how burials were conducted then but 'shrouds' as we understand the term, were not used. The Gospel uses the word 'sindon' which means 'a linen garment'. We know that the Jewish custom in the case of someone who had died a bloody death, as on a battlefield or by crucifixion, that the blood would not be washed off. It should be left on the body and the sheet which is called "sover" used to go right around it. This was laid down in the Jewish Code because in these circumstances it was deemed important to keep all the life-blood with the body. This seems to describe a specifically ancient Jewish arrangement, perhaps unique in the world's known funeral practices. A long, linen cloth went over the deceased's head in precisely the very unusual manner that is indicated in the case of the Turin Cloth.

All over the Shroud there are more than a hundred dumb-bell shaped marks that can only be explained as resulting from scourging. These markings are quite different from any of the innumerable medieval depictions of this punishment. Clearly the impact of the dumb-bell shape, not only broke the skin but actually tore the flesh. They are easily identifiable from the Roman flagrum. This was the fearsome whip with two or three tongs. These were tipped with pellets of metal or bone. They match the marks on the Shroud very well. Roman scourging with the flagrum involved the victim being stripped naked, chained to a column and given a great number of lashes, depending on whether or not he was a Roman citizen and the gravity of the crime. St Paul tells us that he received 40 lashes less one – the maximum number for a Roman Citizen. But Jesus was not a Roman Citizen and he received many more. This would result in the victim being reduced to an exhausted condition, with shivering, severe sweating, frequent displays of seizure and a craving for water.
